

Recombinant proteins: From bench to clinics

Recombinant proteins are produced by inserting a gene for a specific protein into a plasmid vector, which is then introduced into a host cell (such as bacteria, yeast, or mammalian cells). The host cell expresses the protein, which is then purified and used for various applications, including drug development, research, and diagnostics.